

The only guarantee we can give is our commitment.

We are approached by people from around the world seeking our help for many different problems. Sometimes, we are the last port of call in a desperate attempt for a person to regain some stability in their life. Within this, we are commonly presented with cases that the medical profession do not understand or have failed to resolve in some way. These cases, whatever their origin, are usually quite complex and many assumptions are made by those involved. Most often those assumptions are incorrect. This can be the first to change. When it comes to complex cases where all other strategies have failed, we will consider investigating the situation of the potential client to establish whether we can help. We take the approach of only accepting cases we can help in a significant way. If we make a commitment to help, we take our role very seriously and set an intent for a particular outcome. While all healing has a benefit, there are times when we do not achieve a total or complete outcome as planned.

Not surprisingly, this can lead to frustration and even anger for all those involved, including ourselves at times. The reason why we may not achieve the results as intended, can be elusive. Some of those reasons are covered in the eBook Being Human: The contract of life, but I want to make two salient points to keep things in perspective. Firstly, Chris and I are commonly expected to have all the answers when all else have failed. As committed as we are, and experienced within the realms of the downright unusual, we are not all knowing.

No single being whether in the earth realm or part of the spiritual realm, has all the answers. The main reason is due to the complexities of a human existence that go far beyond anyone's understanding. If there is any therapist claiming to have a 100% success rate, I want to meet them. The second point is the most difficult to accept or understand. Occasionally an aspect of the client will block or even reverse any positive changes we may initiate. The client may be crying out on the conscious level for change, but on some other plane they have decided to continue with the current imbalance. This is part of the complexity of a human existence. I can't comprehensively explain this and I know it sounds like a cop-out, but it does happen. Although we need to accept that there will have been some positive changes for the client, I acknowledge that at times it seems to be not enough, or what was intended.

Therefore, we do not guarantee specific outcomes, only our commitment. If we do not achieve the desired outcome for a client, it is not for lack of trying. We do not give up unless we have tried every trick in the book; worn out every tool in our arsenal; bent every rule; completed extra, unpaid sessions; approached the Higher Realms for help and spent a number of sleepless nights attempting to resolve the impasse. What more can we do? In the end, responsibility for change rests solely with each individual, and is dependant on their own commitment to life.

In closing, I offer this quote from Conversations with God, by Neale Donald Walsch. "If you want guarantees in life, then you don't want life. You want rehearsals for a script that's already been written. Life by its nature cannot have guarantees, or its whole purpose is thwarted."

Sincerely,
Mark Pasley
